

Is there a republican model of democracy?

Prof. Andreas Niederberger,
University of Duisburg-Essen

The Author:

Prof. Dr. Andreas Niederberger is Professor of Political and Social Philosophy at the University of Duisburg-Essen. He gained his PhD in philosophy at the Johann Wolfgang Goethe-University Frankfurt/Main in 2002, and continued to teach there before moving to his present position in 2012. Between 2006 and 2008 he was DAAD Visiting Assistant Professor of German and Political Science at Northwestern University. His principal research interests lie in theory of ethics, the history of philosophy (including medieval philosophy and Kant), and political philosophy (globalisation, theories of justice, rights, theory of the state and the rule of law, democratic theory). He is the co-editor, with Philipp Schink, of Republican Democracy. Liberty, Law and Politics (Edinburgh 2013), and the author of two monographs and many articles on ethical and political theory both in history and from a contemporary perspective. Two recent publications in English are 'Are Human Rights Moral Rights?' in Amos Nascimento and Matthias Lutz-Bachmann eds., Human Dignity, Human Rights and the Cosmopolitan Idea (Ashgate 2014), 75-92; 'Climate Justice from the Perspective of Philosophy', in Matthias Dietz and Heiko Garrelts eds., The Routledge Handbook of the Climate Change Movement (Routledge 2014), 84-103.
